Modelling multidimensional data using partial least squares regression. In many situations we are confronted with nonlinear relationships between several variables of high dimensionality, and we can only partially observe such a relationship. In this paper we propose to use partial least squares to exploit data of partial dimensionality. We illustrate the basic ideas using artificial data sets, but the proposed method can easily be applied to real-world data. In addition to the known PLS1, we propose a generalized PLS (G-PLS) method, and we study the influence of the number of latent factors and the number of training samples on the accuracy of the PLS and G-PLS models. We also show that the PLS is related to the canonical correlation analysis and the generalized canonical correlation analysis. The applicability of the G-PLS is demonstrated on high-dimensional biomedical data.

You are going to hear a lot of debate about this in the coming days. It's a debate that always gets close to breaking down into personal attacks: It's either a lie, or a conservative "media hit job" designed to distract voters. President Donald Trump, who has engaged in some of the same media tactics himself, just called it a "fake news story" and "totally made up." But as I watched and listened over the past few days, I thought a counter argument had been left out of the discussion. When the news is bad, Democrats ask, "What difference does it make?" When Trump is accused of being the "worst," they have a new standard: the actual news is now "good." It has even led to Trump supporters and elected Republicans sounding downright betrayed, saying that the press has become the "enemy of the American people." But what if there is a good way to frame the story? I asked myself that question as I thought about the obvious news that set off this controversy. The broken exchange happened when Trump was asked to fire someone by a White House deputy chief of staff. The deputy chief of staff, in turn, was forced to deny saying that Trump was a
